avi modelers capable of rendering not only people, but people-on-things as well. Here's a new blood sports film that features a foot-to-foot interaction with virtual players - and not just because the player in the upper-right in the trailer is a man with a stick raised to knock another man in the head. In fact, if you squint, you might see the "other" man as being a man himself. The university student who recorded this demonstration recently tweeted that the director of the film is very excited about the final results: The documentary film 'Scaling Manhattan' (directed by Rory Kennedy), shot in July 2012, was made for the Screening Room (check website for more info). It's a film about the three main actors in the film, a group of NYU freshmen who take a few weeks off their summer to scale the wall of a major downtown New York skyscraper. Here's a neat one, from a company that will probably make the jump from the fad to a mass market tech product, for the first time this year. Seiko's new'smart watch', the SRP-3G, has 4G connectivity to the Web, has a super-precise GPS, and has a touchscreen watch face. You'll need a Samsung Galaxy 3 smartphone though to use it - and you'll need a network that offers 4G service. But you should be able to talk to the watch from any phone on the same network. Of course, all this assumes you have a smartphone at all - or you could get a GPS watch like the Garmin GPS Live 12, that works in much the same way. You can read more about the SRP-3G here and you can see the video below. You might like to have a look at what others are watching. Here's a very short documentary called : The Crisis of Mass Production (directed by James Faxas). It was made in Germany, and it's about children working in 'assembly lines' to produce things like mobile phones. Here's a new teaser trailer for a video game that uses (sadly, no surprise here) the Steam game technology - and it might be one of the last we see of it. The You Want trailer will be out next month (11 September) and it shows us the new 3D driving game with a rather different feel from other games in the genre - partly because there are no words. 82157476af
